Dean Svend Hylleberg,
University of Aarhus,
Denmark,

August 23, 2006

Dear Dean Hylleberg;

I have recently been informed of the evaluation of the research on sex differences in mental ability by Helmuth Nyborg and of his imminent suspension from his teaching and research supervision responsibility at the University of Aarhus. I urge you to rescind this egregious action.

I have followed the research work of Helmuth Nyborg for over twenty years. During that time he has established himself as a distinguished scholar with an impeccable record of publication that has contributed significantly to our understanding of individual differences, in general, and of sex differences, in particular. Moreover, his leadership in this field is widely acknowledged internationally, as evidenced by his role as editor and contributor to numerous books on this subject and as a member of the board of directors of the International Society for the study of Individual Differences. He is clearly well-known as a reputable scholar and on that basis alone does not deserve the severe action that is proposed.

I am also knowledgeable about his research on sex differences and mental ability and I have read the reviews of this work undertaken by colleagues at the University of Aarhus. The limitations of the work that are reported are quite common in this field of work and are typically taken into account when weighing the impact of the research. The limitations did not prevent acceptance by independent peer review for publication in a respected international journal and in no way do these limitations justify the suspension from duties at the University Aarhus that is proposed. Certainly, such action is an unconscionable assault on academic freedom that is a basic principle of university life.

In this regard, the approach taken to address the issue raised in Professor Nyborg's work is especially unprofessional and repugnant. If a scholar disagrees with a result or interpretation of an effect, the appropriate course is to rebutt or refute the claim through debate and independent research. Co-opting and scrutinizing Professor Nyborg's work, which evidenced no hint of fraud, is plainly deplorable. So too is the attempt to censor the controversial views that emerged from his research.

Sincerely,

Robert M. Stelmack, PhD.
